Self-Advocation Worksheet

A self-advocate speaks up for their rights in a safe, firm and respectful manner. Read the scenarios below and decide if the people are practicing self-advocacy. Put a "check" next to the scenario if they are and an "x" if they are not.

___ Randy has an IEP with modifications and accommodations. There is a sub in class today and she does not seem to know about his accommodations and modifications. She asks Randy to "try the project without them." Randy asks to speak to the substitute privately and explains what an IEP is and why his accommodations and modifications are important. The substitute modifies the project.

___ LaQwisha has a problem with a co-worker getting into her personal space. She has never spoken to her boss or the co-worker about this problem. She is worried that they will think she is complaining. One day, the co-worker enters LaQwisha's personal space and touches her arm without her permission. Frustrated, LaQwisha quits her job.

___ Cara was at a fast food restaurant. She ordered a large hamburger with fries and a Coke to drink. Cara gets her order and checks her bag. There is a chicken sandwich and tator tots in the bag. Cara likes chicken sandwiches and tator tots, so she decides not to say anything and take the order.

___ Marcus was playing a game with his friends. It was his turn, but his friends skipped him! Marcus reminded the group that it was his turn to play. His friends apologized, and Marcus took his turn.

ACTIVITY 1

Inappropriate Behaviors

Circle behaviors you think are inappropriate for the workplace.

- Arriving to work 15 minutes late.
- Bringing a doctor's note to work after you have called in sick.
- Offering to help your coworker with a project.
- Instant messaging your friends when you don't have any work to do.
- Complaining to your coworkers about your boss.
- Asking your boss if you can talk to them about a problem you're having in the office.
- Calling in sick because you were up late the night before.
- Telling your coworker you can't help them because it's not part of your job.
- Waiting until your lunch break to talk to your coworker about your plans for the weekend.
- Writing a message on Facebook or tweeting about your coworker who was fired.
- Asking your boss if you can help with anything when you have finished your work.

ACTIVITY 2

Correcting Behavior

Read the following scenarios and use the space provided to write what the worker did wrong and what they should have done instead.

Shannon was on her way back to work from her lunch break. As she drove back, she noticed her favorite store was having a sale. She stopped at the store and browsed for a while before eventually returning to work. Shannon ended up being 30 minutes late.

Jacob has been frustrated with his new boss at work. He thinks his boss doesn't like him because he won't trust Jacob with more responsibility. After one of Jacob's coworkers was given a promotion instead of Jacob, he logged onto his Facebook page and posted a message describing how mean his boss was.

Tom is taking college classes at night while working in the office during the day. One day he didn't have his homework ready for class, so while at work he did his homework at his desk. When he was about to leave for class, he realized he didn't have a pen or notebook for class, so he went to the supply closet in the office and took a pen and notebook to use in class.

Michael is working on an important project at his desk that he has to finish by the end of the day. He stops to check his email and sees he has an email from his best friend. Michael notices that his boss has gone to lunch, so he logs onto his instant message program and talks to his friend for the next hour until his boss gets back from lunch.
